Tiger

3450

| | |
|---|---|
| Status Critically Endangered | Population Less than 400 |
| Scientific Name Panthera tigris sumatrae | Habitat Tropical Broadleaf Evergreen, Forest, Peat Swamps & Forests |

Today, the last of Indonesia's tigers—now fewer than 400—are holding on for survival in the remaining patches of forests on the island of Sumatra. Accelerating deforestation and rampant poaching mean this noble creature could end up like its extinct Javan and Balinese relatives.

Sumatran tigers are the smallest surviving tiger subspecies and are distinguished by heavy black stripes on their orange coats. They are protected by law in Indonesia, with tough provisions for jail time and steep fines. But despite increased efforts in tiger conservation—including law enforcement and antipoaching capacity—a substantial market remains in Sumatra and the rest of Asia for tiger parts and products. Sumatran tigers are losing their habitat and prey fast, and poaching shows no sign of decline.
